

Thermal Energy Conservation in Kenyan Tea Processing Plants

Okoth, M W

Date: 1991

Abstract

Energy conservation in food processing is not only important in industrialized countries. It can likewise be decisive for success or failure of a technology in developing countries. The present contribution discussed this subject using Kenyan tea processing plants as an example. Of this investigation, general conclusion may be drawn on the possibilities and limits of energy conservation in the food industry.