THE EGYPTIAN CRISIS

'Situation must be faced realistically'

By SEBASTIAN MAFFNER

THE Egyptian crisis presents a problem not only to Britain but also to America. Indeed the situation is such that it reveals the necessity for a more realistic view than from the British one.

Discrepancy

The prevailing opinion of both sides is that some of the British and American proposals are in conflict.

No special treaty links

For America some of these proposals are not only in conflict with the Cairo Declaration but also with the principle of self-determination.

Power vacuum

At a moment when American attention is directed towards the Egyptian situation, the British are faced with a power vacuum in the Middle East.

Found vaccines

The trade agreements on vaccines that have been reached in Washington are a significant step towards the control of epidemic diseases.

Free to forces

It is a pity that the forces of the United States are not free to operate in the Middle East as they are in other parts of the world.

Main points

The main points of the Egyptian crisis are the need for a realistic approach to the problem and the necessity for international cooperation.

No reports

There are no reports from the United States regarding the Egyptian crisis at the moment.

CHANGING HABITS OF AFRICA'S WILD ANIMALS

The habits of wild animals are undergoing many radical changes, and although such changes are inevitable they are nevertheless taking place in a manner that may easily be overlooked. Underlying these changes is human interference, and strangely enough this interference is often intended to benefit the animals by providing them with a sanctuary of sorts.

Animals are not slow to react, and their conditions are so adapting to adapt themselves to the new conditions. In some cases, they are even able to take advantage of the new conditions. For example, the cheetah, which was once a common sight in the open savanna, is now found in the more sheltered areas of game reserves.

In this article Earl L. Saxon, Editor of "African Wild Life," declares: "If we show camps with nature it becomes entirely impossible, despite every stricture of service, to recreate a natural habitat."

As the black rhino in his African habitat is now being hunted to extinction, it is being bred in captivity to meet the requirements of the DeWitts.
