

Abstract:

School feeding is common in Africa and widely recognized as beneficial for both the physical and mental development of the children. However, mainly due to the sharp increase of food prices, many parents are no longer able to pay for their children's lunches. This is where school farming comes in as a means to lower the cost of producing meals and thus make the schools more resilient against market forces.