

A study of the respiratory rates of bloodstream forms of Trypanosoma brucei brucei (pleomorphic strain S69 and monomorphic strain 052) showed that there were higher rates with glycerol as substrate than with glucose. Experiments on oxygen uptake rates indicated that oxygen utilization with glycerol as substrate was 2 to 3 times greater than that with glucose.