

Abstract:

This article deals with multistage group screening in which group-factors contain the same number of factors. A usual assumption of this procedure is that the directions of possible effects are known. In practice, however, this assumption is often unreasonable. This paper examines, in the case of no errors in observations, the performance of multistage group screening when this assumption is false. This entails consideration of cancellation effects within group-factors