

As a player, Michael 'Tank' Otieno cleverly evaded tackles and rumbled over the opposition which explains his nickname.

He was full of energy and seemed to always have a full tank when everybody else's was running low. Otieno had a sure boot and could kick crucial points from any position in the field and some from seemingly impossible distances.

Well, the tank is still full and on January 4, he assumed a new position of the Kenya Rugby Union Rugby Services Manager where he is in charge of national teams, competitions (local and regional), women's rugby, development and training (coaches, trainers, educators) and match officials (referees, match commissioners etc). These are the core functions of the KRU.
